News Around Town

By Mrs. Calvin Robinson

I though this was good: A father was teaching prayers to his little boy. Prompting him, he began: "Now I....."
"Lay me down to sleep," the boy recited.
"I pray....." the father continued.
"The Lord my soul to keep," the boy said.
"If I....." the father went on, but got no response. He repeated, "If I....."—and suddenly the child shouted loudly "If I know you were comin', I'd have baked a cake!"

I am quoting portions of a letter Mrs. J. R. Lawson received from her son, Harry G Lawson, USN, who will complete his boot training at Bainbridge, Md., August 18.—

"Maybe the will make the Times-Virginian, who knows? Well, we have just a little over three weeks to go before your little sailor boy will be on the way home. Things here are beginning to pop around here now. We finished up rifle range last week and guess who was the top man in our company? Yes, that's right, those Rebels showed the Yankees how to shoot. I was high man with a 3.34 out of a possible 3.40. Sam (Ferguson) was second in the company with 3.31. They call Sam and me the Two Sharpshooters from Virginia. They asked us how we did so well. We told them we were shooting at Yankees and just couldn't miss."

Congratulations, boys!

Light Metals

There are many metals lighter than aluminum. The lightest is lithium, about five times lighter than aluminum. However, like sodium, potassium and calcium, which are also lighter than aluminum, it is so active chemically that it cannot be left exposed to the air. Of metals that can be so exposed, beryllium and magnesium are both lighter than aluminum. The weight of a particular volume of aluminum, compared with the weight of the same volume of water, is 2.70 and this is called its specific gravity. The specific gravity of beryllium is 1.85, while that of magnesium is 1.74. For lithium it is 0.53; that is, lithium weighs about half as much as the same volume of water.

Malaya's Kuala Lumpur Sample of Far East Change

Four words — tin and rubber, growth and trouble—sum up the biography of Kuala Lumpur, capital and city of destiny in the young, British-dependent Federation of Malaya. But the story of this city, that of another storm center in today's turbulent and changing East, is never done, notes the National Geographic Society.

Just recently a new tin deposit was discovered in the heart of town. The find promises to stimulate Malaya's already flourishing economy, and to provide more funds for the government's three-year-old struggle against Communist-backed guerrilla insurgents.

The development, however, is hardly an unmixed blessing to Kuala Lumpur. For the opening of an active mine at the deposit site threatens the homes of some 5,000 people in a crowded city already grappling with a housing shortage and problems of crumbling buildings.

Kuala Lumpur, near the costal Malay-Peninsula uplands 200 miles northwest of Singapore, is a metropolis which was literally built by tin and rubber. Less than a century ago it was a mere handful of thatched huts in the jungle. It owed its existence to the discovery, around 1850, of near-by tin fields, worked by a little band of Chinese miners then engaged chiefly in supplying India's metal craftsmen.

In the early days the only transport to and from Kuala Lumpur was by boats poled laboriously along the rivers. The pioneering Chinese—who were to hold their lead in the Malayan tin industry long after the British extended their influence throughout the Peninsula—panned and dug for the accessible ore by hand labor and primitive implements.

It was a wild time and a wild country, with bitter fighting often breaking out between rival Chinese factions, and heads displayed as trophies in Kuala Lumpur's open market place.
